Integration of pharmacokinetic and pharmacodynamic models in a QSP setting: application to the New Drug Application process for ribavirin. The use of new drug applications (NDAs) is a valuable tool in the regulatory development process for therapeutics with unproven activity, unknown pharmacokinetic (PK) characteristics, or for novel dosage forms. In the early stages of development, NDA approval is often granted based on pharmacokinetic/pharmacodynamic (PK/PD) relationships that may not have sufficiently characterized the drug's PK profile. Post-approval, changes in drug formulation, development of active metabolites, or repositioning of the drug as a biomarker for an indication may alter the relationship between drug exposure and clinical response. QSP is a quantitative structural pharmacology modelling technique that can evaluate PK/PD models and their relationship to drug exposure and response. The integrated PK/PD model presented in this paper allowed for development and application of PK/PD principles to an NDA approval process that accommodated potentially new endpoints for clinical trials. The fundamental underlying principles of QSP were applied to a previously developed NDA model that has been adapted to the approval process for ribavirin. The model was applied to the development of a single ascending dose (SAD) trial for the drug under two development paths, including one in which a second-generation drug developed for another indication was repurposed. The modelling exercise had significant impact in both trial planning and design, and supports the value of QSP applied to regulatory development in drug applications.
